Born November 4, 1928 in Tluste, Poland, Julius Roth was a unique man for many reasons.

During World War II, he was in hiding for 19 months with his mother, sister, aunt and a cousin in an attic at a farm in Poland. Because of cramped living conditions, he was separated from his father and brother who had hid at another farm but who were found and then murdered.

After the war, he made his way to France and then became part of the Zionist movement. He came to the United States in 1948 through Canada because of the quotas. On a visit to Israel, he met his wife, Odette.

During the War, out of the necessity of survival, Julius became a great negotiator and a storyteller and so in the United States, he used this skills and started buying and selling produce.

Eventually, he opened his first market called Odette's Market and then a multiple of stores including Jays Farm Market.

He also went into the liquidation business and again started small and built up the business which became General Liquidators.

Always for the family, never for himself, he did not have a selfish bone in his body. He loved his children almost to a fault. They were his life.
