“ I met Larry only once, but he made a meaningful impression & connection. I introduced myself (the father of Jordon's friend, Rowan) and he responded with a big smile and a snug handshake that felt like a hug, an invitation to friendship. He offered kind words about my son (despite having met him only once as well) and we rolled into an easy chat about our kids. When I complimented him on his contribution to Jordon's delightful alchemy, Larry quickly deflected with a humble scoff and chuckle, saying his wife deserves all the credit. We touched on shared interests in snow sports and, before he stepped away to greet someone else, he suggested we meet again on the water this summer. Our exchange lasted only a few minutes, but he felt like the type of soul who was gracious, open, joyful, sincere, compassionate, and so much more beneath the surface... the type of human that brings light to this world... the type of light that persists even when he's somewhere else. Our brief encounter was an impactful gift that I'm grateful to have received. My and family's hearts goes out to Larry's family and friends. Big warm hugs all around!

“ I live in Miami Beach and every time I come back I always spent time with Larry. The kindest nicest guy always the same. He would do anything for family and friends. My father died last year and he came to my house and spent time with my mom and I making us both forget about our grief. He was a beacon of light to all his friends as I saw how much he was loved. So happy I gave him a big hug last Thursday before I left.

“ Every time I saw Larry to drop off or pick up my daughter, I was met with a big smile or a hug- he spread warmth wherever he was no matter who you were. My daughter would often tell me he was a favorite among the friend group... and now through his loss I see and hear how much they all love him. While his time was cut short, I pray your memories stay vibrant, your tears find their way to back laughter, and you always hear his voice in your every day.
