“Verna and I met at the Veranda Club, where I still reside. From the beginning, we both connected. Something in each of us connected with something in the other.

After a few days, I confessed to Verna, “I am a vain person.” “So am I,” she replied. From then on, there was no pretense. “I like a little glitter,” she said. “So do I,” I replied.

The friendship continued to the end. I knew she was frail, and suspected her time was coming to an end. Fortunately, we spent some personal time together those last days. We even sat on the rocking chairs in front of the building, the ones I swore I would never be seen sitting on.

Hasta luego, Verna. Who knows, we may see each other again.

With love,
Emma
